

Culture Change/ Driving Change

This model can be applied to any large-scale change like creating a new culture, driving new mindsets and behaviours, driving transformation etc.

We believe that our behaviour is shaped by our personality and the environment or context in which we operate. Because of this belief we focus a lot on the context that is shaping people behaviour rather than just focusing on people and trying to change people.

We follow these three steps when we support our clients in their transformation journey.

Phase 1

Context framing(the default context)- exploring current reality

- Mindsets of people and beliefs
- The behaviours commonly exhibited
- The external context perception
- The objective realities

Our behaviour is shaped by our personality and the environment or context in which we operate. So understanding the current context that could lead to certain behaviour is important before we change a system. This stage can be also considered as a sensing and sense making stage, one of the most important stages.

We do this context framing by deep structure interviews, focus group meetings, Organisational Network Analysis(Orglens) and studying the existing literature and data. Stakeholders get the Context Framing report from us at the end of this phase.

Phase 2

Context reframing- Exploring Future Possibility

- Shift in external context perception
- New mindsets and beliefs
- The behaviours that need to be demonstrated
- The objective realities that need to be created

Our team with few internal stakeholders plan a context reframing strategy and have an understanding of what could be a new context, new mindsets and behaviours and what goals and results are we expecting.

Then a leadership level offsite to explore this new contexts, behaviours and goals and to align everyone to these shifts. There will be also a general agreement on broadly how to make these changes across the system.

Phase 3

Context creation and sustenance

- Creating new mindsets and behaviours across the system
- Actions and projects for creating new objective realities
- Reinforcement mechanisms and measurement mechanisms

Our team with the internal stakeholders create the strategies for enrolling the larger system to the new identity, mindsets and behaviours. This could be through communication channels to create awareness, learning and development initiatives to build mindsets and capabilities. At this stage we also need to explore and create reinforcement mechanism through policies or process and also a measurement mechanism that give us a sense of our progress.

